There are only three responses to The Spartacus show: you don't know anything about it, you know about it and you completely revolt about the unsconded amounts of sex and the mountain, or you're wild about it and you've probably spent more time admitting that you're trying to convince your friends and family that it's more than just bloody soft. If you haven't seen the TV show, the news of this tie in the game probably won't mean much to you. The show revolves around the character spartacus (originally played by the late Andy Whitfield and then replaced to the point by Liam McIntyre after the original star's death), but it's more than that. The first season and the previous mini-series that followed focused on the gladiatic games of ancient Rome. The Games were blood sports, and brutal deaths were common. The show was much more than that and actually revealed a rather profound and impressive story that included political intrigues and calculated revenge-assuming that you either enjoyed (or may have overlooked) blood and constant sex. At its core, the first season and the next mini-series spoke about gladiators and their sport. This week, Ubisoft announced Spartacus: Legends, a battle game based on the TV show Starz. The game is scheduled for release in winter 2013 as a digitally distributed title on the XBL and and is developing kung fu factory, makers of UFC Undisputed 2009 and Hello Kitty Seasons. Although in this case, we should focus on the UFC game rather than the Hello Kitty title. The game will start you as a raw recruit on Sunday for a second season on Starz, lies in the way she marries specificity – culture, place, sexuality – with universality. Tanya Saracho, the writer and television writer who created the series throughout the story, the texture of layers and the tiny details, has becomefiable about how simple objects can be. In Vidi, the brand of hot sauce can also be a powerful signal of identity, as well as a portal to childhood memories. The wall of sizzles and polaroid photographs in the line isn't just graphite - it's a community portrait and a message to other patrons that the place is safe for them too. Season 1 caught a home-made daughter who inspired great discoveries and personal skates. Sisters Emma (played by Mishel Prada) and Lyn Hernandez (Melissa Barrera) returned to Boyle Heights, in Los Angeles, after the death of her mother, Vidalia - known as Vida - only to discover that she was hiding secrets. Among them was the fact that she had a wife, Eddy (Ser Anzoategui), despite throwing Emma out of the house the year before because she was gay. In addition, Vida bar was financially underwater, and a predatory local mortgage broker wanted to close and turn the building into high-quality housing. In the final episode of season 1, Eddy was brutally beaten in a homophobic attack after Emma chased him out of a bar. The event forced both sisters to see that their mother's business was more than a bad debt - it was a linchpin for a community that understood that their home was just like Emma and Lyn. In just six episodes, with a team that is fully employed by Latin writers, Saracho is outcast in personal experience. Vida spent her first season researching such complex subjects as gentephation and internalized homophobia that caught Emma's anger at her mother for the shame that made Emma feel for herself, as well as the efforts of local activists to preserve her community. But the show also addressed a wider theme: sadness, nostalgia, sisterhood, hope. In season 1 finale, Emma and they realized they wanted to try and keep the bar open, culminating in a beautiful final shot, as women watched the sunrise over their neighborhood, the urban landscape of downtown L.A. bright in the distance. In the second season, which has expanded to 10 half-hour episodes, the partnership between the sisters remains fragile while the financial effort to save the bar in a fierce battle. Lyn is still hedonistic, selfish and chaotic, Emma is emotionally remassy, smoled and demanding as ever. (They're a classic cautionary tale about why mothers should hug their children, she tells the girl.) Emma's efforts to upgrade the bar to attract new clients and provide her future angry community activists who see pieces of Boyle Heights fabric are being ripped off. Lyn's mistakes from season 1 - sleeping with her fiancée ex Johnny (Carlos Miranda) and dealing with credit card fraud - keep catching up. Eddy is trying to recover from injuries while also grieving for Vido, whose unsead presence is wrapped up in the series. She's there in a flashing neo-sign over a bar bearing her name, in the property that Emma collects at the garage sale, in secrets that somehow continue to emerge. But Vida is most present with the sisters and in the ways their lives reflected how she raised them. Prada communicates how many of Emma's behaviors come from her mother's painful (and hypocritical) rejection and how Emma built an armor around her - lipstick, immaculate bob top, forbidden influence - that keeps other people on hand. Emma was soathed when her performance was derisively labelled as a baby queer at a gay wedding in episode three, as if she wasn't yet confident enough in her identity to dress up the way she really wants to. The scene itself, with its discussions about sex tourism and sexual binaria and the rites of passage of the exit, is particularly busy. It's also riveting, full of tension, and set in the periphery of an event that celebrates the relatively new freedom of Americans to love whomever they choose. Vida is full of graphic sexual scenes, which almost all serve a special purpose. The sexuality of Emma and Lyn is the key to understanding them as characters, and sex is rarely just about contentment in the show. Saracho has a shifted awareness of how people often weaponize sex: to distract, to power, to comfort. Emma has casual encounters with men and women, but it's only in the final episode of the second season that she becomes untie enough with someone to kiss them. Lyn, as besoi.a. She internalized the idea that her influence on men was her currency. The new episodes continue to raise questions about ownership, identity and authenticity, but always with recognition of how complex these issues can be. When a new character, Nico (played Roberta Colindrez) makes fun of Emma for her choice, Emma fights back. I've been a cop my whole life because I'm who I am. Why can't it be a Mexican thing if a Mexican is going to taco Valentino? Lyn, who is trying to start a night live with Latin American artists in order to bring more business to the bar, is fenced against for attracting hipsters to the neighborhood, and slandering online like Coconut Becky. Johnny's sister Marisol (Chelsea Rendon) is an activist who has found herself in the midst of opposing forces with which she sympathizes: people who try to keep Boyle Heights in its entirety, and people who think that even beloved local institutions sometimes have to adapt to stay alive. That these conversations take place in a central TV drama feels deep. That Saracho is capable of running them so smoothly into a series that resonates with the boulders and joys and conflicts of everyday life is remarkable. Vida isn't special just because she puts sub-representative American stories on screen. It's special because it does so well, mining epic drama and discreet experiences of the lives of its characters to create something that is elaborate, artifiable and beautiful at the same time. Time.
